Migration can be a force for good. It can help the African continent consolidate its strategic objective of pan-African unity and renewal. Migration can be harnessed for development, peace, prosperity and promote greater understanding. However, it can also be a source of tension as people scramble for limited resources and search for belonging and identity in unfamiliar territories.

How far has South Africa come with migration policy and practice?

What has changed in the recent past? What is broken?

What are the implications of the current status quo or trajectory? How does it impact Human Rights?

What is to be done?
